

C BHN The Newington Board of Health, records 1858-1890

Historical background: This board was established in 1872 and covered roughly the area of west Hull between Spring Bank West and Hessle Road. It had three main roles. Firstly it was to improve the physical structure of the area through surfacing roads, laying drains, lighting streets and ensuring new housing had adequate drainage. Its second role was to control or remove the features that caused disease, such as emptying privies, refuse collection, the regulation of offensive trades and dairies as well as collecting statistics on deaths due to infectious diseases. The final aspect was to promote good health, by means such as the establishment of burial grounds away from congested areas and the promotion of parks for fresh air and recreation for slum dwellers. However Newington Local Health Board fell short of these high ideals. Its area was incorporated in the borough under the Boundaries Extension Act of 1882 (45 & 46 Victoria, cap.115). Just before this occurred, some 6000 houses were rushed through so the builders were not inconvenienced by Hull's stricter controls, which itself were imperfect.

Custodial background: Many of the agreements, contracts and deeds have a red number written on them indicating they have come from the Council's Town Clerks department. These were deposited sometime before 1968. Further deposits were received from the City Architects around 1970 and the City Engineers around 1988.
